

The fact that the FCC is even considering imposing Universal Service Funds charges on Broadband and Wireless ISP's is either a confused mistake or a very subtle attempt on the part of ILEC's to dip their hands deeper into the pockets of consumers. I can't imagine how the logic for this decision was ever conceived. Show me an ILEC that is even considering providing broadband service to any rural market and I will be shocked. There are people much more versed that can comment on a much deeper level about this topic so this is just a comment from an outraged citizen. Please come to your senses, this goes against common sense and the ideals the FCC is supposed to encourage. Don't just give money to the phone companies. Make them earn it.
